CHAPTER XIX THE FALL OF FOBT BEETHOVEN THE next day the cure was continued by a pious musical pilgrimage down the Rhine. Do you remember, asked Johnnie as we entered the train, the time our forces met defeat at the hands of Beethoven? Well, we re going to counter-attack now. We re on our way to his stronghold at Bonn. Bonn was fortunately situated in the British occupied territory, where the invaders were less solicitous than we Americans as to just what the natives were to eat, and in consequence did themselves jolly well. In a dainty room of the Kaiserhaus, overlooking the Rhine bridge, we had the first really interesting meal since leaving France, and washed it down with good old Saint-Julien. At half-past two we were standing before our goal, the birthplace and museum of the composer Beethoven, and eyeing with...
