Not illustrated. 1852 Excerpt: . . . until it had become a divine institution, and that, consequently, the testimony of Herodotus to its Egyptian origin must be overthrown as contradicting Scripture. But any one who takes into consideration the natural proneness of all nations to the adoption of painful rites and customs, will see ground for rejecting that theory. Burckhardt details practices still more barbarous, and which had no religious sanction to enforce them. It has been made a further objection, that the previous existence of the practice would disqualify it for a rite of Divine appointment, as if the value of such rite depended upon novelty in its invention: as well might the sacrament of Baptism be impugned on the ground that people in tropical climates had dipped in the warm stream of rivers from time immemorial. Burckhardts Travels in Nubia, p. 340. Lanes Translation of the Elf Leyl. w. leyl. eh....
