Not illustrated. 1909 Excerpt: . the new movement and to point out that great good might be expected from it in the end, Bishop Andrews was as greatly agitated in mind as it was possible for a man of his equable temperament to be. The two lessons which he had learned in early life stood him in good stead through this period, however, and he kept his mind open for whatever light might come. According to the Bishop s own statement, the turning of a new corner in his thinking came with the publication of Professor William Newton Clarke s Outline of Christian Theology, in 1898. Bishop Andrews had had some acquaintance with Professor Clarke in early days at Cazenovia, and the personal interest in the Professor led to the reading of the book. Perhaps a knowledge of the character of the author predisposed the Bishop to a favorable attitude. In any case the book, by the symmetry of its method and the charm of its spirit, influenced the Bishop profoundly. The following are extracts from correspondence which passed between the Bishop and Professor Clarke: new York, March 27, 1899. Professor W. N. Clarke. my Dear Brother: Though holding through many past years a very pleasant remembrance of yourself and of your most estimable father, mother, and sister, I had in my many movements through the country lost sight of yourself and your work. But last summer, being in the study of a young minister, I found that he had...
