Excerpt: . the play The whole action is concentrated in a single setting, within a period of 24 hours. The scene is a narrow street in the London Jewry. High houses stand right and left. The street is closed at the back of the stage hy a Gate-house, beyond and above which is seen a strip of sky, pierced by the slender spire of a church outside the Jewry. The Gate-house is a strong erection of stone, perhaps twice the height of a man. It is closed by heavy doors opening inwards. Seen to the right of the gate, as part of the Gate-house, is a small door raised the height of three steps; this is the entrance to the Gate-keeper s quarters. On the left, also part of the Gatehouse, is a low archway closed by shutters. The houses on the left side of the street (as seen by one standing facing the Gate house) are built upon a row of heavy stone arches: dark lurking places, in the depths of which are indications of frowsy shops. When the curtain rises the shops are closely shuttered, for it is still night; by day they are seen to be stocked with various merchandise, old clothes predominating. The floors above, projecting slightly, have narrow windows and wooden balconies; from these oddments of clothes hang out on poles. Such are the habitations of the poorer Jews, a squalid warren. On the opposite side of the street is...
